JAPAN AND KOREA.

Baron Hayashi Has No News of Sending of Troops.

London, Oct. 3.—Baron Hayashi, the Japanese minister here, has no news of the movements of Japanese troops to Korea, announced from Paris. In an interview the minister said:

"From the published accounts I am certain that any movements of troops are only the routine relief of the Japanese force guarding the telegraph line from Fusan to Seoul and Chemulpho. To send a small body of troops to Korea would be no menace to Russia and would have no effect on her plans. A mobilization of the Japanese forces on a large scale is not contemplated for a moment; and Korea's consent would have to be obtained for any such step."

The minister added that he still believed Russia intended to keep her promise to evacuate Manchuria Oct. 8. Until that promise was broken Japan was not likely to make any move. The Japanese troops guarding the telegraph lines were stationed in Korea with the assent of Russia as well as Korea.

W. Fitchard Morgan, consul general of Korea in London, also has no information on the subject. He suggests, however, that the time was coming when the powers should agree to Korea being declared an independent, neutral state, as in Belgium.

Japan Explains to Russia.

Paris, Oct. 3.—Information received here through official sources at St. Petersburg show that the explanation given of Japan's moving troops to Korea is calculated to remove suspicion concerning her intention. The number of troops moved is estimated at between 8,000 and 10,000. Japan explains that the movement is part of a plan of experimental mobilization for the purpose of showing her ability to mobilize a considerable force in connection with the friction between Japan and China, but that it has no connection with differences between Japan and any other power. The officials refuse to comment upon the explanation.
